Caution : Creating/replacing a checkpoint file will cause the unit to reboot. And i mean that the unit Will Remain in a black screen and beep sound until a NAV key is pressed and hold it down untill the unit comes back to life. This is not a way to 'switch between navi "lights". For a good solution, see my answer to the problem. 1 2 3 4 SOLUTION #1 (Functional but not recommended) If you want to use a second CD70 navigation system in your car, you should do one of the following: reinstall NaviWest within the same network create a new network for NaviWest, by removing one of your 'extended' navigations & adding an additional CD70 navigation. The second CD70 will be able to use the same old 'network' databases as your first (no need to use NaviWest again), but as you are replacing one navigation unit with another, the first navigation unit will be not able to 'see' the second navigation unit. In short : you can use both units, but the first navigation unit cannot 'see' the second navigation unit. If your unit comes with more than one (up to 4, i.e. a factory new) NAV/CD70 navigation unit, you could install NAViWest to an older navigation unit, using the instructions above. In this case, the old navigation unit will only be able to work in your car once. SOLUTION #2 (Functional) As suggested by @Russel922, you could also install an additional NAV/CD70 navigation to your car, and configure the radio to use the nav1 as an 'extended' navigation, and use the radio for all the other functions, including the screen. Since you said the navigation unit is old, i'll assume that you can modify the unit by reprogramming its EEPROM. Using your car's radio as a NAV/CD70 navigation would mean a simple replacement of the original NAV/CD70 with a new one. You will need to take care of a few details : You will need an OBDII reader like the Skytec Yellow Box (or a PC) to read your car's ECU code. If you are going to install a NAV/CD70 navigation module, make sure to get a NAV/CD70 navigation module, or if you f678ea9f9e
